Nonvoice Agency appoints its first Chief Technology Officer

October 14th 2021, Florida, USA – Nonvoice, the world’s first agency for 5G app developers announces today the appointment of the Company’s first Chief Technology Officer, UK-based mobile technology specialist, James Fryer.

James has been specialising in mobile technology for over 15 years and his experience includes building content services for mobile operators worldwide such as Ringtones.com. Most recently, James has been focusing on developing services and applications marketed directly to consumers as well as supporting app developers as an agent of Nonvoice.

Since joining Nonvoice late last year, James has been instrumental in the Agency’s design, development and deployment of platforms that support the 5G ecosystem including Nonvoice AdCoop, a cross-promotional ad network that encourages app developers to promote other Nonvoice apps and vice versa; and the Nonvoice Alive platform that allows mobile operators to integrate and aggregate consumer apps and experiences for AR games and experiences, education, NFTs/ digital collectibles, and sports.

“It is an honour to take on this inaugural position at Nonvoice. The opportunities within the 5G space for an Agency like Nonvoice and our global team of experts is huge. It has expanded beyond simply representing app developers and to creating platforms that support our clients as well as helping operators easily launch 5G apps and start earning revenues from day one,” said James Fryer, Chief Technology Officer.

“I am delighted firstly that just over a year since launching the agency we are in the position to need a Chief Technology Officer to oversee the range of services we are developing to directly support the Nonvoice ecosystem. Having worked with James previously I know that he will do great things in this role,” added Founder and CEO of Nonvoice, Simon Buckingham.
